The recombinatory search literature argues that innovation is a problem-solving process in which solutions to economically valuable problems are discovered via search. Dosi Search is an uncertain and costly process and is guided by prior experience. Dosi Over time, feedback from past search efforts becomes embodied in the organizational routines that efficiently guide the innovation search activities of organizational members. Nelson and Winter Firms create new knowledge by engaging in local and distant search. March Local search, which is synonymous with exploitation, produces recombinations of familiar and well-known knowledge elements, and is often the preferred mode of search for organizations Cyert and March ; Stuart and Podolny In contrast, distant search, or exploration, involves recombinations of novel, unfamiliar knowledge and is often characterized by substantial costs and uncertainty March ; Nelson and Winter Although distant search can be less efficient and less certain than local search Flemingit increases the variance of search and the possibility of highly novel recombinations Levinthal and March ; Fleming Distant search, across organizational and technological boundaries, can lead to radical innovations that create new technological opportunities and significantly influence subsequent technological change Rosenkopf and Nerkar Despite the risks and costs involved, distant search can be critical for the development or renewal of firm competences March While research into recombinatory search has largely focused on where firms search for solutions, the interorganizational learning literature has emphasized how firms search.
